

Colonel Roosevelt speaking to neighbors at Oyster Bay.

Colonel Roosevelt stood up in his automobile at Oyster Bay's main corners as his neighbors greeted his home coming enthusiastically. The village streets were gay with bunting, festoons and "welcome home" signs, and the greeting he received was worthy of the man who put Oyster Bay on the map. To the crowd he spoke just as neighbors speak to one another. He told of the joy and happiness of finding a new grandson when he got back from the jungle. He spoke of the coming marriage of his son Kermit, and mentioned a few of his boyish pranks which put everyone, including the colonel himself, in the very best of humor.

EXPOSITION SHOWS GREAT WOOD WASTE

Forest Products Exhibit Demonstrates How Great Saving Can Be Effectuated.

WASHINGTON, June 3.—The forest products exposition now being held in New York presents many models and charts from the forest service which show utilization of wood, particularly the use of by-products.

The amount of wood used and wasted is shown in a series of models depicting all stages of the lumber industry from the tree standing in the forest to the boards and shingles in the finished dwelling. The first model of this series shows a number of trees standing in the forest. The next model shows these same trees felled, and forming a pile of logs and a heap of tops and branches. The succeeding step is a miniature sawmill, beside which are piles of lumber, of slabs, and of sawdust, all from the logs shown in the previous model. The next model shows what becomes of the rough boards after they have been through the planing mill; the resultant material in several piles—one of edgings and trimmings, one of shavings, and one of the planed boards. Last comes a newly-finished dwelling house, around which are the odds and ends of the lumber left over from the building.

What Wood Is Wasted.

The relative amount of material used and wasted is indicated roughly in these models, but is shown according to actual scale in another part of the exposition in a series of diagrammatic charts. In the logging process, thirteen per cent of the standing tree is left in the stumps and tops, leaving 87 per cent to go to the sawmill. The various forms of waste shown at the sawmill constitute about 43 per cent of the original tree so that the rough boards constitute the remaining 44 per cent. Most of the sawmill waste is unusable, it is asserted, and due to economic conditions, the millmen say they take out all they can afford to.

Seasoning reduces this to 42 per cent. After the planing and other finishing processes, the finished lumber forms only 39 per cent of the tree. The waste involved in building the house amounts to four per cent more, so that the proportion of the original tree which finds itself finally in the finished dwelling is not more than 35 per cent.

How Waste Is Utilized.

But all of the two-thirds need not be wasted. Some of it at least should go into by-products, according to the forest service which is studying such utilization. The bulk of the waste, such as tops, bark, slabs, and edgings, can be made into charcoal, turpentine, tannic acid, wood alcohol, acetate of lime, pulp and paper, and even the sawdust is made into wood alcohol and grain alcohol, and used in different forms for fuel. Illustrations of this utilization of mill waste are shown at the exposition in a series of wall cases. One case shows the use by a knife manufacturer of the dogwood waste of a maker of shuttle blocks. Another case shows how the waste involved in making large school furniture is converted into scrubbing brush backs for a brush factory. Other cases display shoe lasts made from discarded tenpins, the use of waste veneer cores for mine rollers and for paper pulp stock, sawdust made into floor sweeping compounds, and dowels of various sizes manufactured from co-perage waste.

Non-Inflammable Shingles. Another exhibit consists of the inflammability test upon shingles treated with certain chemicals. One-half of a shingle is treated; the other half left untreated. With the best preservative, far devised, flame which causes the untreated half to burn does not affect the treated half. Portions of the various mechanisms for using saving wood for an important part of the exposition. Thus a model preservation plant is shown, consisting of two small storage tanks, a pressure cylinder, a yard and track, together with photographs of one of the largest wood preservation plants in the country. This is not a complete working model, only certain forms are used to show the general scheme of the plant.

Another exhibit shows a small running model of a paper machine. This is used in explaining the process of making paper from wood. The samples of paper made at this laboratory from woods not generally used, in comparison with standard woods, illustrate the possibility of using new species and utilizing the mill waste. The cup system of turpentine is on exhibit. This system is not as injurious to the tree as the old boxing method, reduces the fire hazard and gives greater yields. The forest service favors the use of the cup system and the exhibit will show the two methods contrasted, both as to injury to the tree and difference in yield.

A Miniature National Forest. Beside the main exhibition relating to forest products, there are certain exhibits relating to other branches of forestry. One of these consists of a miniature model of a Rocky Mountain national forest. This model shows a ranger station and a government tree nursery, besides a system of roads, trails, bridges, fire look-out towers and telephone lines, all built and maintained by the government; by means of them the national forests are both protected from fire and rendered accessible to use.

Another striking model suggests the contrasted effects upon stream run-off and erosion of forested and deforested slopes. The model consists of two simulated hillsides—one of bare soil, the other clothed with vegetation. Water from above is sprinkled alike upon both hills and runs off into two pools. The pool supplied from the bare soil becomes clouded with silt washed from the unprotected surface; the other pool shows only clear water supplied from the protected hillside.
